The car did not tumble but whirled round and round like a ride on a ferris-wheel, cutting through the treetops. Then it slammed into a ravine ten metres below, landing on its wheels.

William found himself sprawled in the backseat, his legs stretched over the collapsed driver's backrest. He looked around. All the windows were shattered and the doors on the driver's side were caved in. He tried to stay calm but he soon realised that the car was filled with the pungent smell of petrol. 5

He hurt all over. The only comfortable position was on his hands and knees. When he lay down, the pain in his chest worsened. Each time he exhaled, he felt flesh flapping at the wound. 10

He groped for his mobile phone and used its light to look around the car. He was feeling very thirsty. All he found was some chewing gum, which remarkably did wonders for his parched throat. He dug through his bag, hoping to also find matches. He had a plan. At daylight, he would get out of the car. If he heard cars passing, he would ignite the petrol and torch the car to attract attention. However, there were no matches. 15
