Read the passage below and answer questions 31 to 35.

The Great Pyramid of Giza was built for King Khufu (known to the Greeks as Cheops) some four and a half thousand years ago. It is a structure of such awe-inspiring dimensions that many people across the centuries have found it hard to credit its creation to human beings. And even harder to acknowledge is the fact that these human beings had not fully mastered the use of the simple rope pulley, let alone explosives, mechanical diggers, power drills, cranes and helicopters.

Apart from its sheer size, the Great Pyramid is also an astonishing feat of geometrical accuracy. Until the construction of the Eiffel Tower at the beginning of the 20th century, it was by far the tallest building in the world for more than two hundred years and there is evidence to suggest that its builders had a remarkably precise knowledge of astronomy too.

Today, thanks to the labour of generations of scholars, we have constructed a pretty clear account of how this remarkable work was achieved. Archaeologists have traced the technical development of the pyramid form from earlier types of Egyptian tombs; uncovered the quarries from which its stones were cut and hauled; located the remains of the barracks complex in which the work force was housed; calculated and painstakingly re-enacted the process of its construction.

However, a few minor points of ambiguity remain. For example, although all the experts agree that some form of giant ramp must have been used in building the higher levels, it has not been settled what kind of ramp that was. For the most part, though, everyone who has studied the matter seriously now agrees that the Pyramid was built over the course of some 20 or so years by a work force of some 20,000 people, of whom 4,000 were the hard core of labourers. And despite the familiar Hollywood image, it is also known that the workers were not slaves, but short-term conscripts, performing a kind of National Service.

This account of the making of the Great Pyramid, although rich and coherent, does not satisfy everyone, and there are many who persist in attributing the Great Pyramid to some agency outside the human race. There is a whole branch of the publishing industry devoted to meeting this hunger for pyramidal mysteries, which is sharpened by movies such as Stargate and The Fifth Element, and shows no sign of tapering off in the 21st century.

Are our children ready for school? Much research has been conducted (36) _____ school readiness. It was found that readiness (37) _____ school is greatly dependent on the environment a child comes from and not just genetics. Genetic factors play (38) _____ important role in a child's core abilities. However, the environment provided for a child remains (39) _____ overall most important factor.

Environmental factors include family resources (40) _____ income. Parents' behaviour with respect to learning and preschool experiences (41) _____ also equally important. Thus, it is only right to emphasise that if a child is nurtured to be a curious and keen learner (42) _____ a very young age, then the type of curriculum given to the child in most situations should not greatly matter. This is because he (43) _____ seek new learning every day.

However, there are exceptions (44) _____ a child does exceptionally well and is ready for school, even (45) _____ the desired environment. Hence, the unending debate on whether nature or nurture plays a more dominant role in a child's development.

I received a request from Hawaii while I was working with the Royal Guide Dog Association of Australia as its puppy-breeding manager. A vision-impaired woman, whose husband was allergic to dog hair, had written to our centre with the hope that we had an allergy-free guide-dog.

"Piece of cake," I thought. The standard poodle, a trainable working dog with tightly curled coat, was probably the most suitable breed. Although our centre bred and used Labradors, I did not anticipate any difficulties in finding a suitable poodle.

It turned out that I was wrong. In desperation, I decided to cross-breed a standard poodle with one of our best-producing Labradors. The mating was successful, but it produced only three puppies. We sent coat and saliva samples of each puppy to the Hawaiian couple and the husband found one sample that was allergy-free. At last we were getting somewhere, but a big job lay ahead. The puppy had to grow up and prove suitable for guiding work; and then it had to be compatible with the visually-impaired client. We had a long way to go.

With a three to six-month waiting list for people wishing to foster our puppies, I was sure that we would have no problem placing our three new crossbred puppies with a family. But I was wrong again. It seemed that no one wanted a crossbred puppy. Everyone on the waiting list wanted a purebred. Time was running out as the puppies needed to be placed in homes and socialised. Otherwise they would not become guide-dogs. In order to attract people to adopt the puppies, I stopped calling them "crossbreeds" and introduced the term "Labradoodle" instead. It worked!

During the weeks that followed, our centre was inundated with calls from other guide-dog centres, vision-impaired people and people who wanted to know more about the "wonder dogs". The publicity of the new designer dogs went national, and then international. With such an overwhelming response, I knew that we were succeeding and hence went on to produce more of the Labrador-poodle crosses.

While all this was happening, I continued training Sultan, the original non-allergenic puppy. He eventually went to Hawaii, amid intense coverage, where as the world's first Labradoodle, he bonded beautifully with his new owner and her allergic husband. Interest in the Labradoodle continued to escalate and inquiries poured in from all over the world from people wishing to either purchase or breed the dogs. I quickly realised that I had opened a Pandora's box when our next litter of ten Labradoodles produced only three allergy-free puppies.

Nothing, however, could stop the mania that followed. New breeds began to flood the market. Groodles, spoodles, caboodles and snoodles were introduced to the market. Were the breeders just too caught up to deliver to hungry customers? Determined to source for the most suitable guide-dog for a client, I unwittingly turned the canine world upside down. Today, I am internationally credited as the first person to breed the Labradoodle. But, I wonder, in my retirement, whether we had really bred a designer dog.
